Observations can also be either direct or indirect. Direct observation is when you watch interactions, processes, or behaviors as they occur; for example, observing a teacher teaching a lesson from a written curriculum to determine whether they are delivering it with fidelity. Indirect observations are when you

data collection methods for program evaluation: observation is equal to the number of observations in the largest data set being combined. Unlike one-to-one reading, this method does include the last observation in the final data set. This method can also be used for comparing values across observations by using the FIRSTOBS option. See example below. data correct ;

This just reads the number of observations into a macro variable, and then use that to specify the first observation. (Note that var1 refers to a variable in your data.) Another approach would be to create a data view that only keeps the last observation and then print that:

How do you print the last observation of a SAS data set observations in a data set, regardless of how it was created. The macros uses the data set information functions, new in late releases of SAS version 6, to provide the information needed. The steps are: 1. Find out whether SAS knows how many observations there are, 2. If it does know, thereâ€™s a function which returns the correct count.
